

THE REALTOR MENTAL PERFORMANCE STARTER KIT

Why Good Realtors Stay Stuck in the Feast-or-Famine Cycle

Seven reasons — and what top producers do instead

By Dave Cole

Licensed Real Estate Broker · 25+ Years · REI & REO Realty LLC · Phoenix, AZ

"Your clients experience your state of mind before they experience your presentation."

BEFORE MISTAKE #1

The Day I Finally Understood the Roller Coaster

About twelve years into my real estate career, I remember sitting in my truck after losing a listing I thought I had.

I had done everything right. I knew the market. My presentation was solid. I genuinely liked the clients.

They went with someone else anyway.

Two days later I had another listing appointment. I drove there on autopilot, still replaying what I could have done differently. I walked in distracted — physically present but mentally still in someone else's living room two days earlier.

I lost that one too.

Sitting in my truck again, something finally hit me.

I wasn't walking into today's appointment. I was still mentally stuck in yesterday's.

That moment changed the way I looked at this business forever. Not what I was saying. Not what I was presenting. What I was carrying — without realizing it — into every room.

What follows are the seven patterns I observed — in myself and in other agents — that keep good Realtors stuck in the feast-or-famine cycle long after they should have broken out of it.

Over the last few years I organized everything that helped me into a system I now call Close More. Stress Less. But before we get there — here is what I wish someone had shown me much earlier.

MISTAKE #1

Nobody Ever Trained Me For This

Every Realtor learns contracts, MLS, negotiation, lead generation, and marketing. Real estate training is thorough on the technical and tactical side.

Nobody teaches recovery. Nobody teaches emotional regulation. Nobody teaches what to do when a deal falls apart, when rejection accumulates, or when the slow period starts to feel permanent.

We are handed scripts for every objection but no protocol for the moment after we lose a listing we thought we had. We learn how to close but not how to decompress between closes.

"I knew how to find clients. I had no idea how to handle what this business does to you."

This gap — between the technical training we receive and the mental demands the business actually makes — is where the feast-or-famine cycle lives.

Studies consistently show that chronic stress reduces working memory, emotional regulation, and decision-making — three skills that determine performance in negotiations and client relationships.

KEY INSIGHT: The most important skills in real estate are not taught in any licensing course. Recognizing this gap is the first step toward closing it.

MISTAKE #2

Carrying Yesterday's Rejection Into Today's Appointment

Lost listings, ghosted buyers, deals that fall apart — rejection is simply part of commission sales. The mistake is not experiencing rejection. The mistake is carrying it, unprocessed, into the next conversation.

When you walk into an appointment still replaying last Tuesday, your client feels something is off. Your listening is shallower. Your confidence is lower. Your presence is diminished.

"I never said I was having a bad week. But somehow they could tell."

Clients are extraordinarily good at reading the emotional state of the person in front of them. Your clients experience your state of mind before they experience your presentation. Always.

Elite performers across sports and business deliberately train recovery because research shows that unprocessed stress from one performance directly impairs the next.

KEY INSIGHT: Top producers treat rejection recovery as a non-negotiable daily practice — not ignoring what happened, but deliberately releasing it before the next conversation.

MISTAKE #3

The Feast Plants the Seeds of the Famine

The busy period feels like success. Multiple deals in escrow, clients calling, calendar full. It is easy to mistake activity for pipeline health.

But during the busiest months, look at what quietly stops happening. The follow-up calls to past clients. The referral asks. The relationship maintenance that builds your business for next quarter.

I stopped asking for referrals during my busiest months. I returned calls more slowly. Without realizing it, I was acting like someone who did not have room for another client — and people responded to that signal.

The feast creates the famine. Not the market. Not your competition. Your own signal.

Research on peak performance shows that even high achievers unconsciously reduce relationship-building behaviors during periods of high demand — creating gaps that surface weeks later.

KEY INSIGHT: Consistency during the feast — continuing to plant seeds even when overwhelmed — is what separates agents who break the cycle from those who ride it indefinitely.

MISTAKE #4

Showing Up to Serve the Commission Instead of the Client

When the pipeline is thin and you need a deal, something shifts in how you show up. You are still professional. Still knowledgeable. But underneath it all, you are showing up worried about the commission.

Part of your brain is running numbers. Part of you is monitoring whether this is going to close. You are not fully serving — you are needing.

"I could feel the difference in myself. I just didn't know how to change it."

Clients feel this. Not always consciously. But in the way that makes them hesitate, keep their options open. Your clients experience your state of mind before they experience your presentation — and commission anxiety is one of the most readable states there is.

Studies on trust and persuasion consistently find that people detect self-interested motivation even when it is not explicitly stated — and respond with reduced trust and slower decision-making.

KEY INSIGHT: The shift from commission-focused to client-focused is not willpower. It is a mental state you can learn to create deliberately before every appointment.

MISTAKE #5

Having No Recovery Protocol

Elite athletes do not compete without deliberate recovery between performances. They have structured rest and specific protocols to process what happened and prepare for what is next.

Most Realtors have no recovery protocol at all. A deal falls apart and they immediately call the next client. A difficult negotiation leaves them depleted and they start prospecting from that state.

The accumulated weight of unprocessed stress builds over weeks and months. Until an agent who started the year energetic is running on empty by Q3 — wondering why everything feels harder than it used to.

"I wasn't burned out. I was just never fully recovered."

Elite performers across sports and business deliberately train recovery because recovery affects performance just as much as practice — often more so during high-volume periods.

KEY INSIGHT: Recovery is not weakness. It is strategy. The agents who perform consistently throughout the year are simply better at recovering than everyone else.

MISTAKE #6

Letting the Slow Period Become Your Identity

Every Realtor has slow periods. The mistake is not having one. The mistake is internalizing it — letting "business is slow" quietly become "I am not good enough" or "I don't have what it takes anymore."

Scarcity thinking changes how you show up. Your confidence decreases. Your willingness to ask for the business decreases. The slow period gets slower.

"I knew my mindset was off. I just couldn't seem to change it."

You cannot simply decide to think differently when your nervous system is in a stress response. You need a deliberate pattern interrupt — not a pep talk.

Studies consistently show that chronic stress reduces working memory, emotional regulation, and decision-making — making it neurologically harder to perform the behaviors that would end the slow period.

KEY INSIGHT: The slow period is a chapter, not the whole story. But without a deliberate practice to interrupt the scarcity pattern, it can begin to feel permanent.

MISTAKE #7

Sleeping Sleep and Calling It Hustle

Real estate culture celebrates the grind. Early mornings, late nights, always available. What that culture does not discuss is what chronic sleep deprivation does to the specific skills this job requires.

The Realtor running on five hours of sleep is not more productive than the one sleeping seven. They are making worse decisions in negotiations, less effectively managing difficult clients, and carrying a depleted presence into every interaction.

"I thought I was grinding. I was actually handicapping myself."

More than performance, consider presence. Your clients experience your state of mind before they experience your presentation — and sleep deprivation makes that state significantly harder to manage.

Research consistently shows that sleep deprivation impairs decision-making, emotional regulation, memory consolidation, and creative problem-solving — all essential skills for successful negotiations and client relationships.

KEY INSIGHT: Sleep is not a luxury. It is a performance requirement. The agents who consistently sleep well consistently outperform the ones who do not.

"Your clients experience your state of mind before they experience your presentation."

This is the idea that connects all seven patterns in this guide.

Scripts matter. Systems matter. Market knowledge matters.

Over time, the agent who consistently walks in with the right internal state often outperforms the agent who relies only on presentation skills.

A PERSONAL NOTE

What Changed When I Started Taking This Seriously

I want to be honest with you about what actually changed when I stopped treating the mental side of this business as an afterthought.

I did not close more deals overnight. What happened was quieter — and more lasting.

■ I started sleeping better.

Not because the deals got easier. Because I developed a way to actually decompress before bed instead of replaying negotiations until 2am.

■ I stopped carrying yesterday into today.

Each appointment started fresh. The lost listing stayed in the parking lot — not in the living room of the next client.

■ I became more present.

My listening improved. Not because I tried harder. Because I was not mentally running numbers while the client was talking.

■ I actually enjoyed real estate again.

Somewhere along the way I had stopped enjoying the work. When the mental weight lifted — the work itself felt different.

■ My business became more consistent.

The feast-or-famine swings smoothed. The valleys got shorter. Recovery time between slow periods got faster.

None of this happened because I worked harder. It happened because I started recovering deliberately — between every hard day, before every important appointment, every night before sleep.

Which Mistake Cost You the Most?

Take a moment and ask yourself honestly — which of these felt most familiar?

- Nobody ever trained me for the mental side of this business
- Carrying yesterday's rejection into today's appointment
- Letting the busy period quietly create the next slow one
- Showing up worried about the commission instead of the client
- Having no protocol to recover between hard days
- Letting a slow period start to feel like your identity
- Running on empty and calling it hustle

If you're like most Realtors — it's probably more than one.

These patterns do not fix themselves. No amount of lead generation training or script practice will override what is happening at the mental and emotional level.

If you've recognized yourself in any of the seven patterns in this guide — these same changes are available to you. That's exactly what Close More. Stress Less. is built to help you do.

Close More. Stress Less.

The first mental performance system built exclusively for real estate agents.

7 guided audio sessions · 6 bonus sessions · 5 PDF guides
$47 one time · Instant access · 30-day money-back guarantee

aethura.app/realtors

Dave Cole

Broker & Creator, Close More. Stress Less.

REI & REO Realty LLC · Phoenix, AZ · 25+ Years